Paris, 19 October 2026

Over the past few days, and more particularly on Saturday, October 17 and Sunday, October 18, our city of Paris has been disfigured by the violence that has taken place there. Taking precedence over the legitimate manifestation of the concerns of so many of our fellow citizens – first and foremost young people, concerned about their future and wishing to enter into the responsibilities of adulthood as best as possible – and making it invisible and inaudible, the scenes of these clashes and looting of extreme violence are still very much present in our minds. We find it hard to believe that the same city that welcomed Pope Leo XIV with joy and harmony could become, less than a month later, the scene of the violence we witnessed.

The consequences of what we have seen are heavy and numerous: people have been injured, including many police officers and firefighters, shopkeepers have seen their lifelong efforts snatched from their hands, journalists have been taken to task, Paris residents, families, and the elderly have been afraid to leave their homes.

I want to express my support and my prayers, which are the support and prayers of the Catholics of Paris, to all those who have experienced the last two days as a trauma, and to invite our fellow citizens to take a leap forward: under no circumstances, under any pretext, blind violence, which injure, steals, fires, can be a legitimate response. At this time, it is up to us as Catholics, through our commitment, the gift of ourselves, to be instruments of consolation, artisans of peace and mutual understanding, not to be discouraged, to bear witness to our hope and to build a just and fraternal world in the midst of our brothers and sisters.

It is also up to us, today and in the days to come, to redouble our zeal in our prayer for our country, so that reason may prevail and that social peace may be maintained, which preserves and rebuilds the bonds between people, which all need to live happily together.
